Cemetery Talk

For nearly all stains on monumental work, except those resulting from oil, use javelle water. This is a simple preparation made from chloride of lime and washing soda. It can be obtained at any drug store. Frequent and copious applications of this liquid will usually restore the marble to its natural condition. It may also be used to good advantage when dirt has become hardened on the surface.

When the stain comes from oil, gasoline of good quality should be used. Saturate cotton waste or blotting paper and press it firmly down on the marble. Allow it to remain for a day or more. If necessary, wetting it often with gasoline. The process may be accelerated by the introduction of sunlight or some form of artificial heat.

When these remedies prove ineffective, the only thing to do is to set the monument out in the open and trust to the action of the sun and frost. This will sometimes succeed when all else fails.

Every cemetery memorial should be cleaned with javelle water once or twice a year, and all the dirt and moss that has started to collect should be removed. If foreign substances are allowed to accumulate, they absorb moisture. This tends to roughen the surface and in turn invites the absorption of more moisture. Keep the marble smooth and uncoated and this damage will be averted.

The monument that has once become roughened can best be restored by thorough treatment with pumice stone or fine grit. It is a practice more or less general to use as a renovator a weak solution of muriatic acid. This should never be permitted. The immediate results may appear to justify the treatment, but in the end you will find that the stone has been greatly injured.
